

COURAGEOUS CAPT. LUCE.

Called to the Witness Stand in the Complicated Merrill Will Case.

A tall, gray-haired man with clear blue eyes, gray mustache and sparse gray whiskers under his chin, was the first witness called in the Merrill will case yesterday morning. It was Capt. James C. Luce of the steamship Arctic, which was run into and sunk on the 24th of September, 1854. The Arctic had 233 passengers, and there were 150 in the crew. Only 97 persons were saved and not one woman. A part of the crew behaved very badly. They filled the boats and when they were about to abandon the sinking ship a place in one of the boats was offered to Capt. Luce, who stood with his little boy by his side where he had been using his utmost exertions to rule his crew. He shamed the offer, and when those who had offered it took his son, he ran after them, off a shelf, and took his son. He went down with his ship hand in hand with his son. They were drawn down about thirty feet, and when they rose they were floating in a moment afterwards. They were in a padded boat floated up to them. Its momentum was so great that it killed the boy. The father clambered into another boat, and after a long and laborious struggle, he and a German were out of it from Wednesday, the day of the accident, until Saturday afternoon. Only four of the ten outlived the first night after the accident, and Capt. Luce, who had been which the Captain was saved, there was a heavy fog. Suddenly it parted and formed a great arch, beneath which was clear air. She picked up Capt. Luce and his two fellow sufferers.

Capt. Luce is an inspector of the Great Western Insurance Company, and has a large office at 204 West 17th st., after 12 o'clock Wednesday.
